

Departmental Seminars

Departmental Seminars - Autumn term 2006/07

The department puts on two separate seminar programmes: the Departmental Seminars (DS) and the Research Seminars (RS). The Departmental Seminars are joint seminars, organized by 2 or more professors (convenors), and are essentially teaching seminars, aimed at examining broad developments within the discipline, and exploring major theoretical and methodological issues. Each semester the department will put on 5 to 6 Departmental Seminars (8 to 9 sessions per semester). Alongside the Departmental Seminars are the Research Seminars (8 to 9 sessions per semester) which are organized by individual professors (or in some cases jointly organized by 2 professors). The Research Seminars are intended as specialized seminars dealing with the research in progress of professors, researchers and visiting scholars. Researchers normally attend the Research Seminars of their supervisors.

First year researchers are required to take 3 seminars in the autumn semester (RS or DS) and two seminars in the spring semester (RS or DS). Of these five seminars the researcher has to choose two DS. A researcher is not confined to the Departmental Seminars offered by the Department of History, but may, where appropriate and with the approval of her/his supervisor, take a seminar offered by another department. The Department formally requires you to register with the Departmental Administrator the titles of the seminars, which you must attend during each of your first and second semesters of study. During the autumn semester all first year researchers will be required to hand in a written presentation and to give an oral presentation upon the subject of 2 of the seminars that they are attending.

The teaching programme for the autumn semester will run from 9th October to 8th December 2006. The teaching programme for the Spring Semester will start on 8th January and end on 9th March 2007.

Literature, History and Culture: Novels, Intellectuals and Modern Politics

In the past decades the borderlines between intellectual, cultural and literary history have become increasingly blurred, giving rise to a rich mixtures of approaches, as exemplified in the work of scholars such as Stephen Greenblatt, Kevin Sharpe, Stefan Collini, Wolf Lepenies etc.

Following an earlier seminar series (spring 2004) the aim of this seminar is –at the most general level-- once more to explore the possibilities and pitfalls of using literary sources for the study of cultural, intellectual and political history.

In contrast with the earlier seminar the focus is on one genre in particular, that of the novel. Thus the seminar explores the interrelationships between novels and the political and intellectual life of modern Europe. One important leitmotiv is the question how 19th and 20th century intellectuals made use of the novel to act politically. Here the focus is not so much on the works of individual authors, but more on a number of key topics. Thus we explore themes such as the interlinkage between revolutions and novels, the role of the novel in the manifestation of celebrity, and its importance in the attempts of intellectuals to come to terms with issues of alterity and identity.

In the course of the seminar we will in addition study a variety of methodological approaches, from the work of pioneers in cultural history such as Johan Huizinga to New Historicism to Narrativism.

Finally, we will use the occasion to look at how a number of novels have been used by modern filmmakers, in a –modest and entertaining-- attempt to discuss the relationships between historical meaning and modern visual representation.

History and Social Sciences

This Seminar aims at providing an overview about the rich, multifaceted and sometimes entangled relations between history as a discipline and social sciences. The starting point of the reflection lies in the idea that, at least since the beginning of the 20th century, history has been defined in a dialogue, sometimes conflictive, with other sciences dealing with human beings: sociology first, but also economics, political sciences or anthropology. Over more than a century, the variety of that dialogue, related with the strength of the national traditions of history and their specific evolutions, has shaped a large and differentiated landscape.

During the second term, prof. Romano will continue the DP, focusing more accurately on history and anthropology in the last twenty years European context.

World History and the History of the Seas

Much is being written, even more is being said these days about the twin (and overlapping) concepts of world history and global history. What do these terms mean? How useful are they as analytical tools for the study of the past? To what degree should one accept claims that these concepts entail a radical re imagining of the past, most especially of Europe's past. These, and other comparable questions, will occupy our attention in this seminar. We shall approach the subject critically (if not skeptically) in an attempt to gauge the meaning and heuristic value of these concepts.

We expect that two questions/issues will recur in the course of our discussions: 1. To what extent will the concepts of world and global history challenge and might even change approaches to the study of historical problems conceived in local, regional, or national terms? 2. Traditional interpretations of Europe's relations with the rest of the world (as per Part I of this syllabus) have often been defined as being "Eurocentric" (as per the currently fashionable term), imputing to European agents the major, if not principal role in the emergence of a world order, dominated by Europe. These interpretations were, in turn, rooted in the twin concepts of progress and of a unified, linear, almost teleological concept of time. The question on which we may wish to focus some of our discussions is whether the displacement of attention from Europe to other regions of the world (as per Part II of this syllabus) compels us to alter (or even abandon) the concepts of progress and of linear time. Part III of the syllabus (comprising the semester's last three weeks) approaches the history of the oceans as a possibly useful variant of world history.

Our weekly readings will focus on a series of recent publications on the subject. Our weekly sessions will bring into focus issues contained in the readings that are indicated below (copies of which may be obtained from Mrs. Koniordos, in the secretarial office.) It goes without saying that participants are expected to have read the assigned materials, and to be prepared to discuss them in class.

Comparative and Transnational History. On Definitions, Theories, Methods and Cases Study.

The seminar starts with the assumption that historical studies should go beyond the nation–state which has been the main actor and subject of past historiographies. It tries to introduce different variations and approaches of comparative and trans-national history and will discuss their value for research. It will critically stress the empirical achievements of comparative and trans-national studies and present ongoing research in early modern and comparative European and global history.

As part of this seminar an international conference on history of consumption from a comparative and trans-national perspective (24 and 25. November 2006) is conceived in which specialists in early modern and contemporary history of consumption will discuss on theoretical and methodological tools as well as on cases study. It is confirmed the participation of M. Berg, Giovanni Levi, A. Schurrman, Mathew Hilton, Peter Scholliers among others.

Usually on Thursday at 9.00AM in the Cappella
