Resilient neoliberalism? Policy responses after the Great Recession in Europe's periphery.

Historically, major economic crises have also always been turning points for policy paradigms. Crises were moments for critical choices, when established paradigms collapsed, and alternatives were tested. In this respect, the Great Recession seems to differ. A growing literature tries to grapple with the surprising resilience of neoliberalism even after its spectacular failure as manifested in the financial crisis. The project seeks to contribute to the debate on economic crisis, policy change, and the resilience of neoliberalism by comparing the policy responses of a selected group of peripheral European countries (East and West), through the lens of housing and housing finance policies, policies towards the financial sector, and the public sector.

The politics of financial crises: Debt revolts and debt compliance in the European crisis

The debt crisis in Europe has brought into sharp relief the hierarchical nature of the European economic order. It has turned a relationship between formally equal and interdependent member states of the European Union and the European Economic Area into a hierarchical one between creditor and debtor countries, and ushered in a new era of coercive governance especially for those countries that had to request emergency funds to cope with the fall-out from the crisis. The project explores how Europe's heavily indebted periphery has reacted to the conditions imposed by its creditors. Why have some countries revolted against their creditors, while others have complied with their requirements?
