

European Political Economy and Public Policy

Waltraud Schelkle

Thursdays, 15:00-17:00, Villa Schifanoia Mansarda Meeting room (2nd floor)

This course has two premises. First, European Political Economy is both Comparative and International Political Economy, i.e. it draws on insights from both and, in turn, combines them in ways that are also enlightening for CPE and IPE. Its affinity to CPE goes beyond the worthwhile study of how different member states shape and respond to market integration in the EU. European integration entails polity-formation, the evolution of a second-order political system that complements the first-order polity of member states. Its affinity with IPE stems from the fact that European integration is a process that affects jurisdictions and institutions beyond the EU.

Second, public policy is core to the study of political economy. Policies embody “the concern with substantive decisions” that, in Jon Elster’s words, lend “urgency to political debates” (Elster 1986 The market and the forum: three varieties of political theory 128). The contestation over the merits of different policies structure the democratic process and policies largely determine “who gets what, when and how” as Lasswell’s definition of politics has it.

The sessions each week revolve around a socio-economic policy domain but with a view to how political economy concepts and theories can inform the analysis of policies. Wherever possible, the readings try to introduce classic contributions in the context of contemporary debates.

Seminar participants are expected to introduce the topic with reference to the readings in one week and write up what we discussed in another week.
